ontents	First, we outline that there is no uniform definition of 'hate speech' under international human rights law, rather, it is a broad concept which captures a wide range of expression. The toolkit advances a typology for identifying and distinguishing different forms of 'hate speech' according to their severity, guided by states' international human rights law obligations. (Part I)
	Second, we provide guidance on what policy measures State and non-state actors can undertake to create an enabling environment for freedom of expression and equality that addresses the underlying causes of 'hate speech' while maximising opportunities to counter it. (Part II)" (p.3)
	Finally, we outline the exceptional circumstances in which the State is obliged by international law to prohibit the most severe forms of 'hate speech', and where also States may under international law place other restrictions on 'hate speech'. This includes guidance on ensuring that such prohibitions are not abused, and to ensure that where sanctions are imposed they are appropriate and proportionate, as well as ensuring support and redress for victims.
